MEMORY AND MIND.

(From Prof. Draper's Conflict between Science and Religion) more upon it, a spectral image of the wafer comes plainly into view, and this may be done again and again. Nay, more, i the polished metal be carefully put aside where nothing can deteriorate its surface, and be so kept for many months, on breathing again upon it the shadowy form emerges.

Such an illustraton shows how trivial an impression may thus be registered and preserved. But, if, on such an increasing may thus be ganic surface, an impression may thus be indelibly marked, how much more likely in the purposely-constructed gauglion! A shadow never falls upon a wall without leaving thereupon a permanent trace, a trace which might be made visible by resorting to proper processess. Photo-graphic eperations are cases in point. The partraits of our friends, or landscape views, may be hidden on the sensitive surface from the eye, but they are ready to make their appearance as soon as proper developers are resorted to. A specter is concealed on a silver or glassy surface until, by our necromancy, we make it come forth into the visible world. Upon the walls of our most private apartopon the wais of our most private start-ments, where we think the eye of intra-sion is altogether shut out, and our re-tirement can never be profuned, there exists the visages of our acts, silhoutles of whatever we have ever done. It, after the eyelids have been closes

It, after the cyclids have been closed for some time, as when we first awake in the morning, we suddenly and stendiastly gazi at a brightly-illuminated object, and then quickly close the lids again, a phantom image is perceived in the indefinite darkness beyond us. We may satisfy ourselves that this is not a fiction, but a reality, for many details that we had not time to identify in the momentary glance, may be contemplated at our leisure in the phantom. We may thus make out the pattern of such an object as a lace curtain hanging in the window, or the branches of a tree beyond. By degrees the image becomes less and less distinct in a minute or two it has disappeared. It seems to have a tendency to float away It seems to have a tendency to float away in the vacancy before us. If we attempt to follow it by moving the eyeball, it suddenly vanishes.

Such a duration of impression on the retina proves that the effect of external interests of proves that the effect of external interests.

influences on nerve vesicles is not necesinfluences on nerve vesicles is not neces-sarily transitory. In this there is a cor-respondence to the duration, the emer-gence, the extinction, of impressions on photographic preparations. Thus, I have seen landscapes and architectural views taken in Mexico developed, as artists say, months subsequently in New York—the Images coming out, after the long voyage, in all their proper forms and in all their proper contrast of light and shade. The photograph had forgotten nothing. It had photograph had forgotten nothing. It had squally preserved the contour of the ever-

Act there, then contained in the braid more permanently, as in the retina more transiently, the vestiges of impressions upgans? Is this the explanation of interior organization or dream.

Nature has thus implanted in the organization of every man means which impressively suggest to him the immortality of the soul and a future life. Even the benighted savage thus sees in his visions the fading forms of landscapes, which are, perhaps, connected with some of his most pleasant recollections; and what other conclusion can he possibly extract from those unreal pictures than that they are the foreshadowings of another land beyond that in which his lot is cast? At intervals he is visited in his dreams by the resemblances of those whom he has loved or hated while they were alive; and these manifestations are to him incontrovertible proofs of the existence and immortality of mannestations are to him incontrovertible proofs of the existence and immortality of the soul. In our most refined social conditions we are never able to shake off the impressions of these occurrences, and are perpetually drawing from them the same conclusions that our uncivilized ancestors did. Our more elevated condition of life in no respect relieves us from the inevitable operation of our own organization, any more than it relieves us from infimities and disease. In these respects sil over the globe men are on an equality. Savage or civilized, we carry within us a mechanism which presents us with mementoes of the most solemn facts with which we can be concerned. It wants only moments of repose or sickness, when the influence of external things is diminished, to come into play, and these are precisely the metal things is diminished, to come into play, and these are precisely the metal things is diminished, to come into the thits it is going to suggest. That mechanism is no respecter of persons. It neither permits the haughtiest to be free from the monitions, nor leaves the humblest without the consolation of a knowledge of another life. Open to no opportunities of being tampered with by the designing or interested, requiring no extraneous human agency for its effect, but always present with every man wherever he may go, it marvelously extracts from vealiges of the impressions of the past overwhelming proofs of the realities of the future, and, gathering its power from what would seem to be a most unlikely source, it insensibly leads us, no matter conclusions that our uncivilized ancestors did. Our more elevated condition of lif

Countship,-In courtship, the men are supposed to be in the active, and women in the passive voice. Exceptions are recognized as occasionally taking place; but the world notes not a vast multitude fo cases in which the lady, There are some simple experiments though not apparently, is the actual orwhich illustrate the vestiges of ganglionic impressions. If on a cold, polished metal, as a new razor, any object, such as a wafer, be laid, and the metal be then breathed upon, and, when the moisture has had heart of man to the reception of an intime to disappear, the wafer be thrown off, though now the most critical inspection of the polished surface can discover no trace of any form, if we breathe once in the property is a property in a p
